Weekly Update October 27, 2013

We shot the last set of photographs for Detroit Revived and are just finishing adding text. All in all there are fifty four photographs and a total of around sixty five pages. We're at 45meg so that's approaching the upper limit for a Kindle book. We're adding additional narrative regarding some of the locations, such as Greektown, Indian Village, Capitol Park and Corktown. We're also waiting for the last of the questionnaires to come in. We're on target for a mid-November release and things are looking good.

Campus Martius, early Saturday morning

I went to the Solutions at Sunrise fund raising breakfast at the MGM Grand Hotel in Detroit Friday morning for the charitable organization Southwest Solutions. I would estimate that at least 700 people were there. The agenda was tight, since it only lasted from 8:00am to 9:00am. A few people spoke with three of their success stories and they showed a couple of short films. I never heard of Southwest Solutions before I was invited to the breakfast. They provide family counseling, education, veteran services and housing. Southwest Solutions has helped hundreds of people.

This set the direction for the next book. I talked to the President and Executive Vice President and they said they would love to be part of Detroit Revived, but there is simply no room left. When I thought about it, what they do is outside the scope of Detroit Revived.

The next book will be about some under the radar charitable organizations that exist in Detroit and the great work they do. Southwest Solutions will be one of them. The title of the new book will be BROKEN CITY, BIG HEARTS. I plan on shooting it during the winter and in black and white. Unlike Detroit Revived, BROKEN CITY, BIG HEARTS images will be much more stark. We plan on kicking off planning in late November and starting production in December, 2013 through March, 2014.
